

We pay a fee to have a phone line in our house. We then pay taxes to our government for that privelege. We have the phone line so we can contact friends, family and anyone else when necessary. I do not pay these fees and taxes so that a telemarketer can call me and pitch some business idea or product to me while I am trying to enjoy my family. Suppose they are tying up my line while I am trying to call someone in an emergency, will the FCC take responsibility for those precious seconds that may seperate life and death with regards to emergency response? NJ may have the toughest rules in the country but someone always will. There is no need to make an example as our goverment tries to protect our privacy. We pay for our phones, phone lines and additional services for our personal use, not to be contacted by desperate businesses looking to make a sale.
